This invention relates generally to racks for open area stores and the like. More particularly, this invention relates to a shelf rack for merchandise in open area stores. Shelf racks are typically utilized in open area stores to hold merchandise. The shelving typically utilizes metal shelf brackets that are welded to the structure of the floor and support the shelf. These shelving units typically do not support the weight of the merchandise above the shelves. If a shelf is supporting weight, a metal support can be provided for the shelves. High-throughput screening of hyperthermophiles for mercury resistance and biocorrosion resistance. Microbial resistance to mercury is limited to obligate microorganisms. The hyperthermophiles have the potential to be much more effective in mercury bioremediation compared to mesophiles because of their stable endospores and ability to tolerate high temperatures. This study developed a high-throughput screening system for mercury resistance and biocorrosion resistance of selected microorganisms from the Chinese hot springs. The draft genome sequences of seven hyperthermophiles (including Archaea and Bacteria) that were isolated from the hot spring Yuncheng were analyzed. The annotated genome sequences and sequences from the draft genomes in the GenBank database were used to predict their functions and, then, to design primers and detect the mercury-resistant and -degrading genes. By using this system, a total of 15 bacterial strains were isolated and identified, and their functions were screened, indicating that the Over 800 million people use Facebook, Facebook has changed people's expectations in the way they socialize and communicate with each other, and over the years, people have gotten accustomed to the changes and now have grown accustomed to the idea of having an account on the social network, but what if it buckles under the sheer amount of activity? What if we lose our data? What if it doesn't work for us? What if we never get a user experience that is reliable? What if we are stuck on the social platform that is about providing an experience? In an age of AI, which is beyond the imagination of most of us, what if we get replaced by the technology? Will we even know? Let alone be able to do anything or change anything? TEDxBonnBE spoke to Alex Osterwalder, co-founder of GROUP.
